We update our alternative datasets tracking luxury sales across key Asian markets, assessing the latest market and category trends and implications for Richemont and Burberry ahead of 2Q27E reporting next week. The inaugural edition of the series can be found here.

Richemont: We see upside to 2Q27E consensus on JM OSG. Our regressions point to +13.4% group OSG in the base case, which translates into +16.5% JM OSG, +50bps above company-collected consensus, assuming the other two divisions perform in line with consensus (3-4% OSG). Japan is likely to be a source of positive surprise, given the continued resilience of jewellery and favourable FX. More importantly, early data suggests that the trend has continued into October, with jewellery sales growth likely accelerating sequentially in Japan. On margins, however, we see less scope for upside, with our 1H27E GM% estimate in line with consensus after incorporating recent FX movements.

Burberry: Top-line expectations look reasonable, with a minor risk to margins. Our regional indicators imply c.+2.5% Retail LFL for 2Q27E, modestly below company-collected consensus of c.+3%. However, Burberry has been outperforming the market in recent quarters with locally relevant initiatives, in APAC and the US in particular, which could potentially lead further upside (see Burberry: Key themes ahead of 2Q27E). On margins, consensus currently expects 1H27E Group GM% of 67.8%. This implies a YoY stable underlying R&W GM% of 68.7%. However, we note that 1H26 GM% benefited from a one-off inventory provision release. Given that OPEX looks reasonable (c.£10m higher YoY to account for phasing of marketing spend), there could be a 50-100bps downside to 1H27E consensus EBIT margins (£5-10m).

Luxury demand weakened through the summer, but September data points to a better exit rate. Our latest market indicators broadly corroborate company commentary that luxury demand softened in July/August before improving in September. We see this trend in both Japan and HK, across jewellery, apparel, and accessories.

Jewellery continues to stand out, with early October data suggesting that recent resilience may persist. Despite increasingly demanding comparables, jewellery remained resilient throughout 3Q26, with double-digit growth observed in both Tokyo and HK. Importantly, the first October datapoint from Isetan suggests this relative resilience has continued into the beginning of 4Q26: jewellery growth accelerated to +24% YoY from +15% in September despite a tougher comparison base. While we note that sales in calendar 4Q will be heavily skewed towards the end of the quarter, the positive start should provide some reassurance that jewellery's relative resilience is continuing.

Korea remains one of the stronger markets, although momentum moderated through the quarter as FX turned less supportive. Luxury sales growth at Korean department stores remained firmly positive throughout 3Q26, but growth decelerated from +29% YoY in July to +16% in August and +7% in September, versus +34% in June. This is likely explained by FX, as the KRW strengthened sequentially against the currencies of Korea's five major inbound tourist markets (CNY, TWD, HKD, JPY and USD).

INVESTMENT IMPLICATIONS

In 2H26E we continue to prefer Richemont as our best idea (see Richemont: From Conglomerate to Compounder - the "right" valuation and Global Luxury Goods - A Tale of Two Luxury Consumers), and rank Burberry as our best self-help story.

MODEL UPDATE

We make slight tweaks to our assumptions for Richemont and Burberry for 2Q27E/ 1H27E, as more data have become available.

- Richemont: We bring down gross margin by -40bps to 63.9%, to reflect the impact of adverse FX movements. This leads to -40bps lower EBIT margin on JM to 32.4%. We are in line with consensus expectations on both margins.
- Burberry: We bring up Retail & Wholesale EBIT margin by +50bps to 1% (+£5m to EBIT) on the back of more detailed margin analysis included in this note.

METHODOLOGY

We augment our alternative dataset tracking luxury shopping mall sales in Mainland China, with region retail sales data in Hong Kong, Korea, and Japan. We run correlations with reported regional quarterly performance for Richemont and Burberry.

In order to arrive at a single predicted value for 3Q26 at group/ division level:

- We use the predicted value from the regressions for each region for the non-F&LG company/ divisions, combined with consensus estimates for regions where we don't have a reliable correlation. We then apply a set of weights based on the reported regional revenue mix in the prior year if available; otherwise, we take a simple average.

We flag the following caveats to our data and regressions:

- Despite the high correlations between reported regional performances and our data, the predicted values can still deviate materially from reported outcomes, which could be substantial when expectations are low.
- Our China alternative dataset is based on estimated sales from stores located across a wide range of Chinese shopping malls, spanning different cities, tiers, and sizes. However, it excludes Hang Lung malls (e.g. Plaza 66 in Shanghai).

RISKS

Cie Financiere Richemont SA

On the downside:

1. Operating margin recovery of specialty watchmakers is bound to take time, as the overall market recovery still yet to come;

2. Cartier and Van Cleef & Arpels are seeing increased competition from players like Laopu Gold (not covered) in China;

3. Jewellery demand normalization trends happen quicker than expected.

Burberry Group PLC

On the downside:

1. Execution of the brand turnaround could encounter problems;

2. Operating leverage may disappoint as the brand revival may cost more than anticipated.
