Strategy Data Pack – November 2026

Key Points:

- The Index Catch-Down Is Likely the Final Stage of This Correction.
  - We have argued that the mid-cycle transition would end with the index catching down toward weaker breadth, and that process is now underway even as the average stock improves.
  - We are getting close, but would like to see either further confirmation from our sentiment indicator.
  - Our year-end base case remains 8000 for the S&P 500.
- Financial Conditions Are Doing the Fed's Work; Liquidity Remains A Risk.
  - Fed Chair Warsh acknowledged the tightening already delivered by financial conditions to some extent.
  - His comments suggest the bar for a more dovish Fed pivot remains high—i.e., he was unwilling to say financial conditions are outright "tight."
- Midterms Should Help Clear Another Important Overhang.
  - Historically, large cap stocks have gained approximately ~15% in the six months following midterms, with similar strength in both the cap-weighted index and average stock.
  - The more notable risk comes post the election with the potential for renewed military escalation with Iran or tariffs.
- Earnings Season Continues to Favor Quality, Particularly Free Cash Flow.
  - We have a preference for companies with durable cash generation, strong balance sheets and improving earnings revisions.

Overweight: Industrials

- Earnings revisions and macro indicators for Capital Goods have inflected higher, despite geopolitical and tariff-related risks.
- Manufacturing data remain supportive: new orders rising, inventories benign, ISM resilient, and backlogs meaningfully improving.
- Freight spend growth, improving C&I loans, and stabilizing short-cycle revenues signal a healthier industrial demand backdrop.
- Capex growth is accelerating, driven by earnings recovery, fiscal tailwinds, data-center buildout, and reshoring dynamics.

Overweight: Financials

- Banks hold a significant amount of excess capital and our MS Banks team models this to expand with Basell III Endgame and GSIB surcharge revisions.
- Forward earnings growth is improving (14%), valuations remain attractive (12-13x), and earnings revisions breadth has turned positive.
- Loan growth and SLOOS signal upside momentum, especially for mid-size and regional banks; M&A activity is set to recover.
- Financials and Banks, in particular, historically perform well in curve steepening regimes.

Overweight: Consumer Discretionary Goods

- U.S. consumer remains resilient despite higher gas prices, supported by high-income spending share and ~$65B real income tailwind from the OBBBA.
- Household balance sheets continue improving; labor market is stable, and aggregate consumer earnings expectations are up since Iran conflict.
- Consumer Staples are more sensitive to energy prices; we prefer Discretionary as earnings revisions breadth re-accelerates.
- Discretionary Goods benefit from services-to-goods wallet shift, improving pricing, and technical support at long-term relative levels.

Underweight: Consumer Staples & Real Estate

- We are underweight Consumer Staples and Real Estate on the back of our view that the rolling recession ended on Liberation Day and that we have begun a new rolling recovery. These sectors are likely to lag on a relative basis, in our view.
- We have a preference for Cyclicals over Defensives in 2026 as we believe strong operating leverage will drive market broadening.
- Consumer Staples face headwinds from tariffs, commodity costs, low immigration, and a weakening low-income consumer. Utilities are highly bifurcated between AI-plays and more traditional energy providers.

Equal Weights

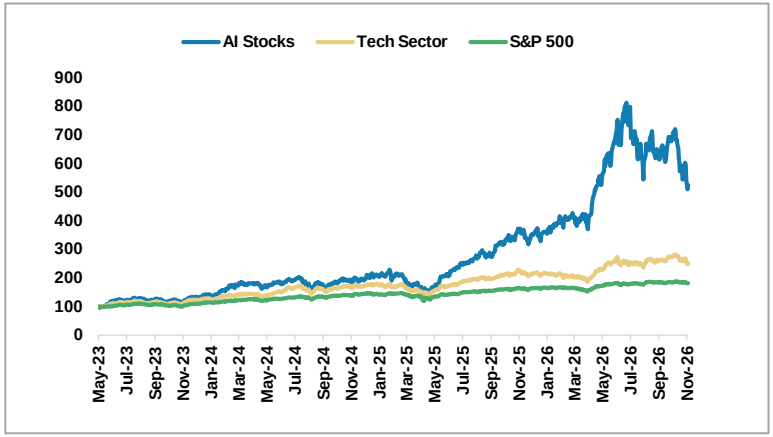

Technology

- AI-exposed stocks have outperformed over the past two years but have pulled back in recent months. Capex continues to fuels an ongoing investment cycle.
- Our CIO survey data is expecting a pickup in Tech spending in 2027 across all pockets.
- The Tech sector is highly levered to labor productivity gains as AI implementation diffuses across the economy.
- We see the hyperscalers as an attractive relative value trade given their strong forward earnings growth at undemanding valuation levels.

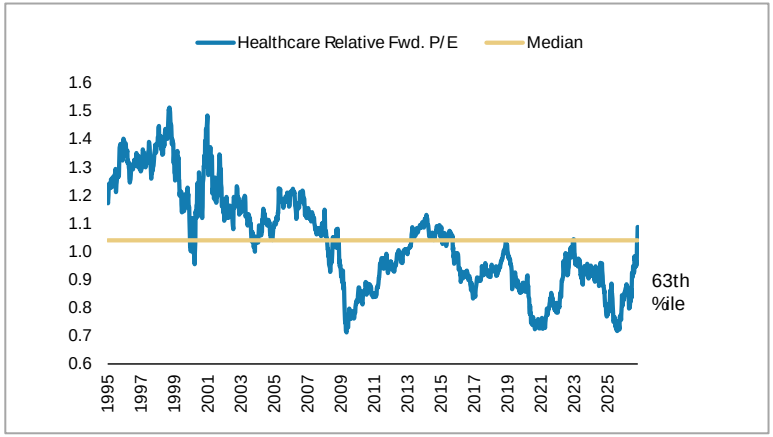

Healthcare

- Healthcare valuations have risen back near long-term averages on the back of defensive outperformance.
- Policy overhangs have reduced which is increasingly reflected in prices (clearer CMS pricing guidance, on-time PDUFAs, and tariff/MFN dynamics). This has brought generalists back into the Healthcare trade from our conversations.

AI Stocks Continue to Outperform

Healthcare Valuations are Historically Low

Equal Weights

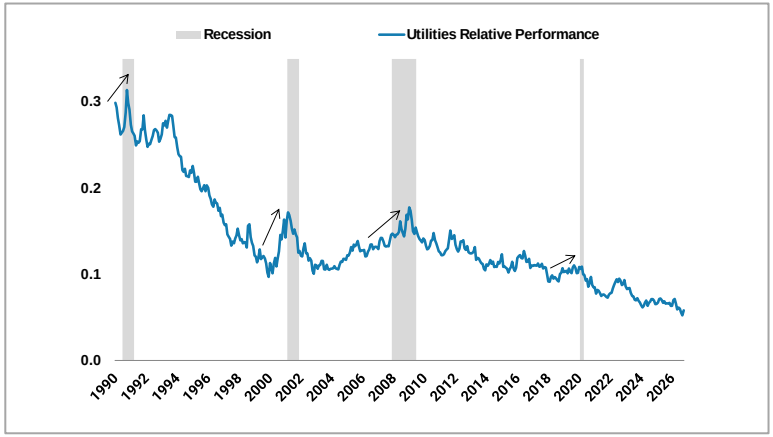

Utilities

- Utilities are beneficiaries of the GenAI theme and can benefit from increased interest and focus on Energy capacity.
- Reliable energy sources are increasingly important and the post Covid era has sparked traditional capex spending. Utilities with exposure to both traditional and clean energy ventures are set to benefit and reinvestment could provide further support for the sector.
- Ultimately, we prefer cyclical over defensive exposures in what we believe is an early-to-mid cycle environment.

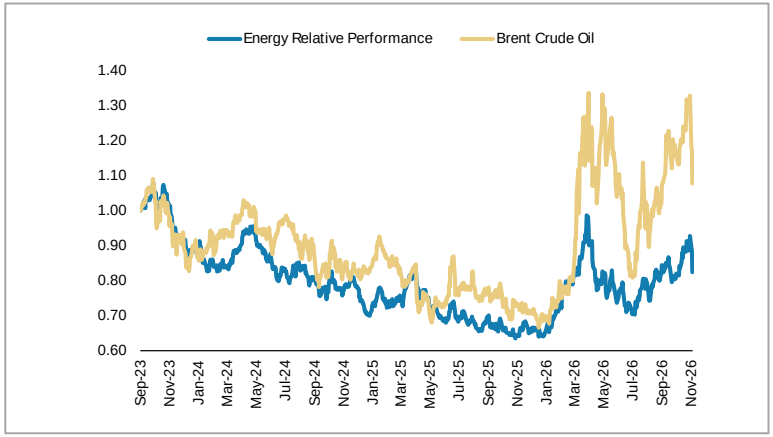

Energy

- Energy equities outperformed the index through early March but have lagged on a relative basis as investors moved past peak uncertainty.
- Geopolitical uncertainty is still high in absolute terms and energy equities could be an attractive hedge if oil normalizes to higher levels.
- FCF margin for the space remains well above its historical average, net debt to EBITDA remains below its long-term run rate and HF net exposure appears under-owned.

Utilities are a Late Cycle Outperformer

Equal Weights

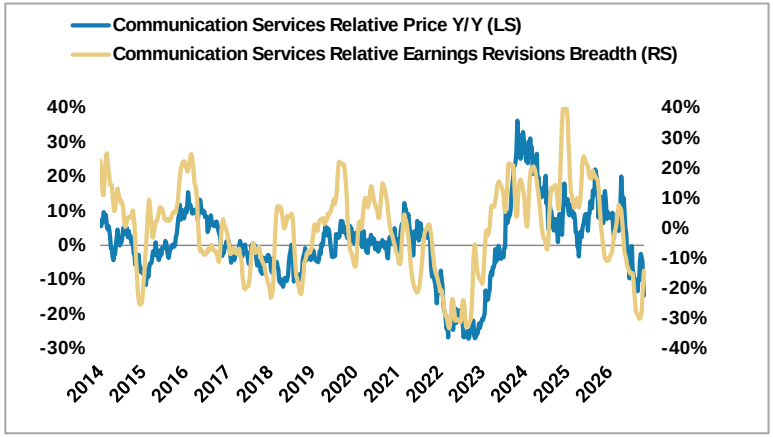

Communication Services

- Technology spend and media advertising are both cyclical metrics and winners may be idiosyncratic ahead.
- A few names take up a large share of the sector and continue to crowd out smaller, incumbent names.
- Cap-weighted Comm. Services has performed well given the high concentration in megacap stocks. We are watching the equal weighted performance as broader sign.

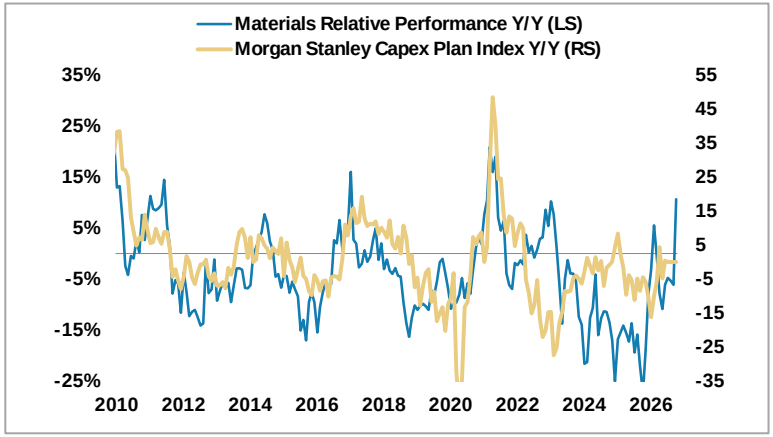

Materials

- Materials are a cyclical sector but are highly sensitive to global growth. The sector is highly dependent on commodity pricing which may not recover in-line with the expected US recovery.
- Increased capex remains a catalyst for materials and the sector could benefit from the start of a new capex cycle.

Communication Services Revisions Breadth Rebounding

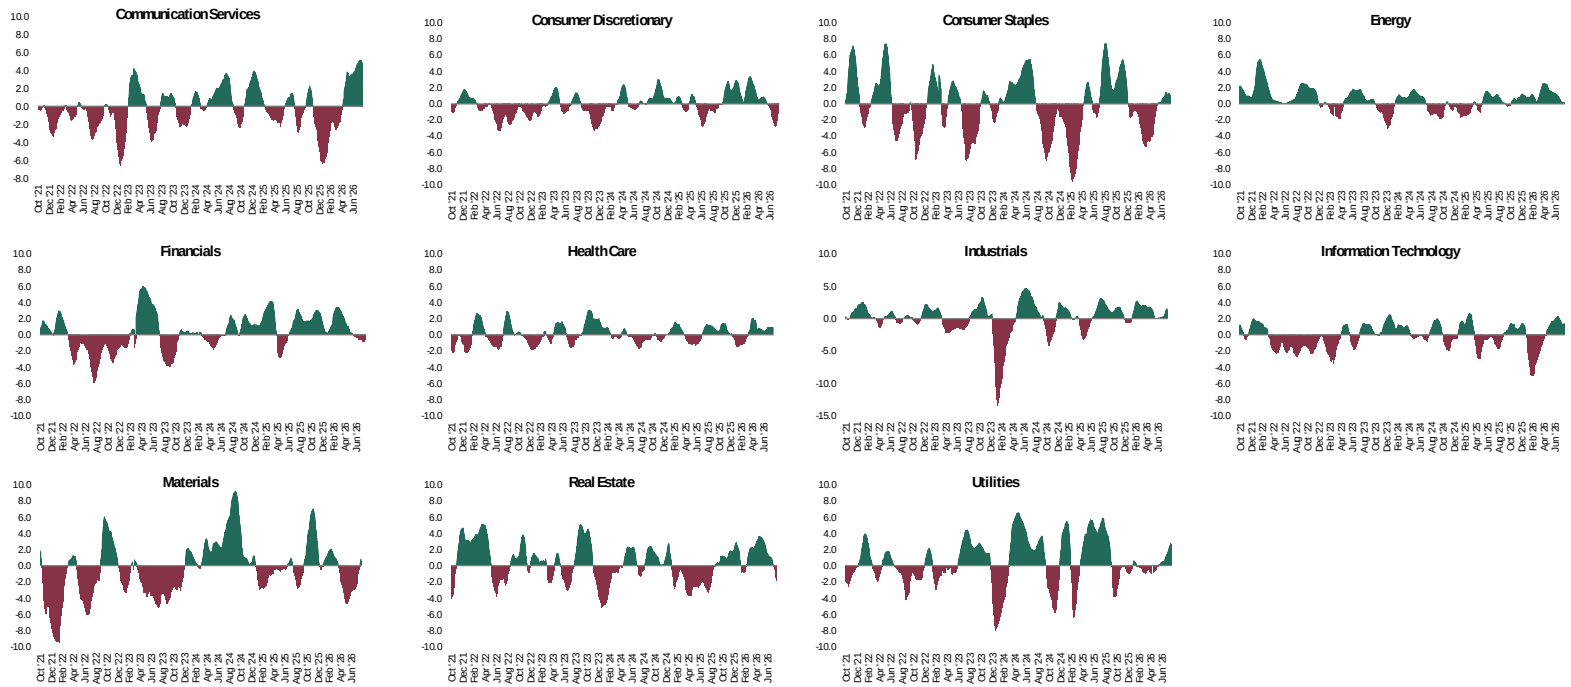

Rising Capex is Historically Positive for Materials but GenAI is Causing a Shift in the Type of Capex Spend
